New Report Published by CDC: Prosecuting Youths as Adults Creates Younger Repeat Offenders

(Washington, DC) – A study published by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), led by a non federal Task Force on Community Preventive Services, released today finds that transferring youth under age 18 to the adult criminal justice system significantly increases crime and endangers public safety. Youth who have been previously tried as adults are, on average, 34% more likely to commit crimes than youth retained in the juvenile justice system.

After an extensive review of published scientific evidence, the Task Force on Community Preventive Services recommended “Against laws or policies facilitating the transfer of juveniles from the juvenile to the adult judicial system.” In reference to the review of evidence, the report states “the review indicates that use of transfer laws and strengthened transfer policies is counterproductive to reducing juvenile violence and enhancing public safety.”

"The practice of transferring juveniles to the adult justice system fails young offenders and society at large," said Robert L. Johnson, Interim Dean of the UMNDJ - New Jersey Medical School and a nationally recognized expert on adolescent issues who served on the Task Force. "While in adult prisons, impressionable youth offenders are placed among hardened criminals who take them under their wings and groom them for a life of crime. It should, therefore, come as no surprise that youth offenders transferred to the adult criminal system are later arrested 34 percent more frequently than are their peers sent to juvenile courts and facilities."

The release of the Task Force Report coincides with the reauthorization of the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act (JJDP) of 1974. Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on the JJDP are set for December 5th.

This Task Force Report recommendations support updating the JJDP by extending its ban on the placement of children (age 18 or younger) in adult jails, no matter what court they are in – juvenile or adult. These important updates are supported by a coalition of over 200 organizations nationwide through its initiative: The Act 4 Juvenile Justice Campaign, which calls on Congress to reauthorize the JJDP (www.act4jj.org).

“This national report from a panel of community health experts highlights the importance of treating youth under the age of 18 in the juvenile court with appropriate services and better outcomes,” stated Betsy Clarke, President of the Juvenile Justice Initiative in Illinois. House Bill 1517 was introduced in Illinois in 2007 to provide for juvenile court services to 17 year-olds in Illinois. This bill would increase the juvenile court age for misdemeanors only to age 18.

The federal government and 38 other states use the age of 18 as the age of juvenile court jurisdiction. In Illinois, the current age is 17. Under current law, juveniles can be transferred to adult court but there is no mechanism to adjudicate 17 year olds in the juvenile court.

Increasing the age to 18 in Illinois would provide for legal uniformity and consistency, acknowledging that the majority of youth under 18 are still in high school. “House Bill 1517 recognizes the compelling research from the CDC’s publication that transferring youth under age 18 to the adult justice system increases violent recidivism instead of improving public safety,” said Clarke.

Passage of House Bill 1517 in Illinois and reauthorization of the JJDPa in Congress would reflect the will of the people. A February 2007 Zogby Poll, commissioned by the National Council on Crime & Delinquency (NCCD), revealed that 7 out of 10 respondents believe that putting youth under the age 18 in adult correctional facilities makes them more likely to commit crime.

The CDC published the Task Force findings in their latest Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report – Reports and Recommendations. The study found that violent outcomes associated with the transfer of youth to the adult system include:

- An increase in pretrial violence
- Victimization of juveniles in adult facilities
- Elevated suicide rates for juveniles incarcerated in adult facilities.

“The Task Force report sets the stage for continued and meaningful reform,” noted Liz Ryan, executive director of the Campaign for Youth Justice. “We are calling on federal, state, and local officials to reverse their policies that send more and more youth under the age of 18 to adult courts, jails and prisons every year.”

The Task Force Report follows the release of a new report by the Campaign for Youth Justice, “Jailing Juveniles: The Dangers of Incarcerating Youth in Adult Jails in America,” which found that on an average day 7,500 young people are held in adult jails in the United States – with an annual rate possibly several times higher.

The Campaign for Youth Justice report’s findings about the risk youth face in jail echo the Task Force report and are disturbing and shocking:

- Sexual Assault: When youth are placed with adults in adult jails, they are at risk of physical and sexual assault. In 2005, 21% of all substantiated victims of inmate-on-inmate sexual violence were under eighteen years old, even though youth make up less than 1% of the total jail population.
- Suicide: Youth have the highest suicide rates of all inmates in jails. They are 36 times more likely to commit suicide in an adult jail than in a juvenile detention facility, and 19 times more likely to commit suicide in an adult jail than youth in the general population.
- Damage to Communities and Public Safety: Placing youth in the adult criminal justice system increases their likelihood of re-offending. Children who are prosecuted in adult court are more likely to be re-arrested more often and more quickly for serious offenses.

"Now that we have the facts borne out by every scrap of data on the subject, let's turn our attention toward fixing a flawed strategy," Dr. Johnson said.
